Course Description

This course examines the history of London on the cusp of the modern age. Between 1550 and 1750 the city was transformed from a packed square mile of workshops and churches, bounded by a city wall and intensively governed, to a metropolis of trade and empire, bustling shops, polluting industry, enticing leisure and low-level crime, stretching from Wapping to Westminster and Islington to Vauxhall, and with connections to the Atlantic and Caribbean. The city's population was young, disproportionally female, and increasingly diverse. This course focuses on London's people and the structures with which they lived, introducing a range of historiographical approaches to put individual lives and themes in historical context.
