Course Description

This course examines ways of questioning media forms, texts, and systems. It explores the breadth of media studies through attention to the ways in which media matter in the formation of individual and collective identities and in the practices of everyday life. Students build on their own experiences of media as consumers, audiences, and users. The course encourages critical attention to how the field of media studies has historically been forged through its key figures and to the tools for questioning the media they have developed.
