Course Description

This course introduces the causes, consequences, and contexts of contemporary migration and ethnicity focusing on selected cases from Asia and the Americas. This course provides a sociological introduction to migration, migrant incorporation, and racial and ethnic relations. It considers how societies experience and manage immigration. Moreover, while migrants are a distinctive group, they are also part of a larger whole, with implications for how we comparatively understand ourselves. We examine key migration theories, concepts and contemporary debates focusing on the experiences of different groups of migrants. This course entails discussions on human mobility, power relations, and dynamics of structure, agency, adaptation and the interconnectedness of place and identity. Weekly readings will illuminate the social, economic, and political salience of migration and ethnicity.
