Course Description

This course explores the cinematographer's craft in the fields of exponometry, processing, and other postproduction technologies. Students review cinematographic theory and analyze the various exponometric (photometric) methods and their effectiveness in changing the aesthetics of the cinematographic image. Additional course topics include the "correct exposure" and exposure latitude from a technical and aesthetic point of view, phenomena in TV technology, possibilities in the technical processes, and different postproduction technologies such as printing, telecine, and transfer. The course consists of lectures and seminars, and practical assignments.
