Course Description

This course examines the sources and conduct of Chinese foreign policy from both theoretical and empirical perspectives. The first part of the course explores the domestic and international sources of Chinese foreign policy. It examines major factors that influence China's foreign relations, including historical legacies, the international system, domestic politics, and nationalism. The second half of the course turns to the practice of Chinese foreign policy over a wide-range of issue areas such as China's relations with the United States, Cross-Strait relations with Taiwan, territorial disputes, nuclear proliferation, economy, energy, and climate change. Students examine the interplay of internal and external factors shaping China's foreign policy and gain a comprehensive understanding of the foreign policy making process, at elite and societal levels in China. Texts: Andrew Nathan and Andrew Scobell, CHINA'S SEARCH FOR SECURITY; Robert Ross and Zhu Feng, eds., CHINA'S ASCENT: POWER, SECURITY, AND THE FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS. Assessment: midterm (35%), final exam (40%), attendance and participation (25%).
