Course Description

This course explores Spanish contemporary foreign policy by focusing on its continuities and changes since Spain's democratic transition, and, especially, since Spain joined the European Union. By using the main theories of foreign policy analysis, along with academic readings and policy documents, the course explains how Spanish international relations have evolved in recent years. Substantial attention is given to the question of whether Spain can still be considered a foreign policy actor independent from the European Union. The course analyzes whether the presence of progressive or conservative cabinets has had a substantial impact on Spanish foreign policy. It explores the institutions involved in the foreign policy making process of democratic Spain and analyzes Spanish foreign economic and defense policy. Additionally, the course covers Spain's foreign policy towards the European Union, Latin America, the Mediterranean, and Africa. It also examines the directions of Spanish foreign policy under the Aznar and Zapatero administrations.
