Course Description

This course analyzes systemically the phenomenon known as globalization, as well as current public and academic debates in France that focus on a critique of globalization and its local effects. It is structured by three main analytical standpoints. The first is the history of the process now known as globalization, a history still under debate. The second perspective comprises a look at the main features of the phenomenon of globalization: intensification of worker mobility and migration; vastly increased capital flows as well as flows of goods and services; and the significant increase in information exchange, or cultural globalization. The third point of view is that of the main actors of globalization (states, international organizations, NGOs and transnational movements, multinational corporations) whose roles are transformed by the effects of globalization.
