Course Description

This course is a linguistic introduction into three aspects of the structure of Spanish: the sound structure (phonology), the internal structure of words (morphology), and the internal structure of sentences (syntax) in relation to its meaning (semantics). These three aspects are studied in the light of modern linguistic theory. Students get insight in how universal aspects of human language surface in Spanish, and how Spanish linguistic structure differs from the structure of other languages. After completing the course, students have: knowledge and analytical skills concerning the phonological, morphological and syntactic characteristics of Spanish; knowledge and analytical skills in order to carry out an internet search targeting certain morphological or syntactic phenomena in Spanish; academic skills to write a short research report; academic skills to include references in accordance with the guidelines of the APA, by making use of RefWorks; initial insight in the Spanish language needed for any professional use of Spanish, including teaching and translation.
