Course Description
This course focuses on the component parts of English, including the sound system, the internal structure of words, the structure of phrases and sentences, and meaning, and examines how these components are acquired and used by English speakers. While emphasis is given to the structure of English, data from Korean is looked at for cross-linguistic comparisons. The overall goals are: to become familiar with the key concepts and terminology needed to describe and analyze language; to gain a basic understanding of the way language works; to appreciate how languages differ (and how they're the same); and to help in your reading of the first language acquisition literature. Textbook: O'Grady, William, John Archibald, Mark Aronoff & Janie Rees-Miller, CONTEMPORARY LINGUISTICS: AN INTRODUCTION.
