Course Description
The effects of empire on Britain and other European nations have increasingly fascinated historians. In recent years, historians have reappraised the ways in which the societies, cultures, politics and economies of European nations were affected by being part of empires, provoking debates about the place of empire in British and European history. This course focuses on Britain, asking how important the empire was in British life. Politics and the economy are considered, as well as the effects of the empire on elite and popular culture, and how British peoples' experience of empire varied with gender, class, and region. The course also engages with the controversial historiographical debates about the cultural and social consequences of decolonization in Britain, including debates around race and immigration.
