Course Description
This course adopts a multi-disciplinary approach to the study of tourism and leisure, exploring in detail the economic, social, cultural, and geographic implications of tourism on physical and human landscapes. Tourism is presented here as a powerful agent of change at the local level and as the product of changes on the global scale. This theme is substantiated with concepts, models, and theories drawn from the social sciences as well as from geography, and with empirical case studies from the Asia-Pacific. The course enhances awareness of the integral links between tourism and contemporary society and the way tourism may be harnessed by different societies to maximize economic benefits while minimizing environmental and cultural degradation.
