Course Description

This course covers theoretical perspectives and methodologies related to the scientific study of motivation and emotion. With an emphasis on empirical evidence, the course focuses on how emotional states contribute to the expression of motivated goal-directed behaviors, and vice versa. Students examine these processes from a variety of psychological perspectives (e.g., biological, cognitive, developmental, social). This course provides students with tools for understanding and regulating motivation and emotion, both intra- and interpersonally. Each week students explore a different aspect of motivation and emotion and how these processes relate to human psychology.
