Course Description
This course examines how history is used outside the walls of the university. Students consider uses of history, how they are shaped by political, cultural, social, and economic contexts, and how they change over time. How is history produced for non-academic audiences different, and why? Is public history more or less conservative than academic history? Can academic historians usefully play a part in these debates? Course topics include heritage, politics and policy, history and the media, and history in schools.
