Course Description
This course introduces students to set texts, both canonical and non-canonical, offering variants on the theme of "Journeys," a topos that embraces both literal and imaginary displacements to "real" and symbolic places and spaces alike. Read in English translation, the texts are originally written in a range of languages (Arabic, French, German, Italian, Persian, Russian, Spanish, and English), represent a number of different genres (e.g. novels, letters, film), and span a broad historical range (typically from the 13th to the 21st century). Students analyze the many ways in which "Journeys" have been conceived and represented in different literary traditions, genres, and times. Further work on comparative theories and methodologies as well as issues raised by translation underpin the course, and provide students with the opportunity to reflect and build on skills acquired at earlier stages of the comparative literature program.
