Course Description

With contributions from fields like cultural history and theory, social and cultural anthropology, design, arts and media studies, the lecture series "Dis/Entangling material futures" renders visible the multiple entanglements and disentanglement associated with the making and unmaking of material futures. Contributions also highlight a variety of methodological approaches, knowledge constellations, and modes of critique emerging at the intersections of the humanities, social sciences, arts, design, and curatorial practices. They require addressing what is at stake when conducting material research, from inside as well as outside of established institutions (academic or otherwise).
