Course Description

This course introduces basic statistical methods of empirical social research. It covers how these approaches assemble, describe, and draw inference from information at hand, namely, data. The topics covered in this course range from basic statistical concepts to numerical and graphical descriptions of samples, to correlation and regression describing relationships between variables, and to statistical inference for populations. In so doing, we discuss the strengths and weaknesses of various statistical approaches. The course also introduces the statistical package called R to analyze a variety of data.
