Course Description

In this course, the core processes for developing theory-and evidence-based interventions are highlighted. Several topics in the field of applied psychology are discussed, such as socio-economic health inequities, safe sex, as well as sustainability topics such as pro-environmental behaviors. The application of the role of reserve capacities such as psychological and social capital, or stigma are reviewed. The course concludes with first-hand examples of existing behavior change programs, from problems they target and who are involved, to theory and empirical evidence, to development, implementation, and evaluation.
