Course Description

This course familiarizes students with various aspects of work and organizational psychology. Questions that are addressed during the course are: How can organizations select good employees? What can organizations do to maintain a healthy and motivated workforce? What are effective leadership styles? What does a high-performance team look like? Which work factors lead to stress? To answer these questions, the course presents an array of different topics from work and organizational psychology such as work stress, occupational health, emotions in organizations, leadership, personnel selection, work motivation, and teamwork. The course consists of lectures, an individual assignment and a group project in which students either work on a practical consultancy project (e.g., develop a plan how to address an issue in an organization) or a research project (e.g., develop a specific idea for a field study). At the end, there is a 'mini-conference' in which groups present the results of their group project.
