Course Description

This course explores issues in the lives of children and young people in contemporary society through the framework of developmental psychology. Topics include adoption and early institutionalization, aggression and bullying, children's use of electronic media, and childhood obesity. The course focuses on the role of theory in guiding research, the importance of adopting a developmental perspective when working with children, and critical analysis of research. It illustrates how theories and research in developmental psychology are applied to guide and inform practice and policy relating to contemporary issues that affect the lives of children and young people.
