Course Description
This course examines the sociology of work, considers the emergence of modern work, and assesses the nature of contemporary work and workplace organization. The course covers themes from rationalization, discipline, and workplace organization of time, to emotional labor, unemployment, domestic labor, and low-waged work in the global economy. The course considers both global trends and specific features of contemporary work, and contextualizes work in the movement from Fordist models of production to post-Fordist and globalized production.
