Course Description
This course deciphers how narratives are constructed around race, privilege, and identity, and how they shape perceptions that contribute to inequality and injustice. In the context of race, marginalization, and privilege, students explore the dichotomies of savior and saved, parent and child, animal and human, and light and dark. How are these concepts institutionalized in education, religion, the justice system, and sexual politics? How are they sustained? Through the analysis of film, literature, music, and the media, this interdisciplinary course teaches students to identify and evaluate these narratives to understand their influence on the identities of nations and people.
