Course Description
This course engages students with contemporary issues in mental health through social science, the arts, and humanities. Students gain a deep and critical understanding of contemporary issues in mental health through engagement with perspectives from science, social science, and the arts. Resources for learning include lectures, workshops, academic journals, films, fictional literature, autobiographies, poetry, and paintings/photographs. Through engagement with this wide range of materials students are encouraged to engage with a diverse range of perspectives and experiences, as well as think about the nature of evidence and how it is used within health care.
