Course Description
This course examines the historical background against which contemporary political developments unfold. It explores the processes which have connected different parts of the world and made it possible to think of our history as global. In contrast to international history, in which attention is mostly devoted to interactions between states as we understand them today, global history concentrates on how connections have been forged between all manner of societies, economies, cultures, and political practices over time. In order to make these broad historical developments accessible, the course is organized around a series of key tipping or turning points in global history. The course focuses on the colonial and imperial processes which have shaped the world as we encounter it today.
