Course Description

This course introduces the contemporary and emerging stakes posed by the governance system of human migration at the local, national and international levels. In dialogue with case studies and comparative research, the course considers how European states seek to control immigration inflows. The externalization and internalization of migration control have transformed the geography of public intervention, opening new fields for political interventions for a range of multiscalar actors: civil society organizations, municipalities, diaspora groups, international organizations, etc. The course provides a theoretical toolbox to understand the dynamics at stake and knowledge on the ways new categories of actors interfere with the management of migrations.
