Course Description

This course introduces the contemporary and emerging stakes posed by international migration in the international arena. In dialogue with case studies and comparative research, the course explores how states adapt to the changing features of human mobility in a context of growing geopolitical (and climate) instability and how this affects interstate relations. The externalization of migration control and diaspora surveillance policies have transformed the geography of public intervention, thereby opening a new field for diplomatic engagement. The course also provides an understanding of the ways new categories of actors interfere with the management of migrations: international organizations, civil society organizations, cities, and private companies.
