Course Description
After nearly 30 years of politically inspired violence Northern Ireland is now apparently “at peace.” Whether or not that peace endures is not the immediate concern of this course. Rather, the class focuses on understanding why there was such a prolonged period of virtual war. Students also examine what, if anything, has changed to make those that once sought to destroy the state now happy to participate in the government of the state. The course considers the varying claims made both by opponents of the state, and contextualizes their conflict within an analytical paradigm that helps us understand their motivations.
