| Course Description |

This course provides a detailed and complex understanding of some of the key themes in Australian indigenous studies. It uses the physical, symbolic and metaphysical role of land and country in Australian indigenous society as a starting point for the consideration of critical issues in indigenous and settler relations in contemporary Australia. Issues discussed may include land tenure, crime and punishment, political representation, social policy, cultural production, governance and economics. Using land and country as a base, these issues will be explored from indigenous and non-indigenous perspectives and from the interdisciplinary perspective of literary studies, philosophy and law.
