Course Description
This course introduces students to the discipline of global history and discusses what is special about a global historical perspective, how global history can be differentiated from other approaches to historical science, which topics and questions global history focuses on, and what controversy provoked this new access. The course builds on these topics to explore various aspects of the so-called first wave of globalization in the nineteenth century. The second part of the course focuses on historical case studies and how global history can be presented. A stated goal of the study of global history is to overcome patterns of national historical interpretation and Eurocentric perspectives, and to investigate global transfers, networks, and exchange processes.
