Course Description
This course develops a critical understanding of sexuality and its historical, cultural, and social contexts. This course treats sexualities as social practices, rather than medical and biological phenomena. It challenges common sense, popular, and even scientific views that sexual behaviors and preferences are explained by the genetic and hormonal makeup of the human body. The course explore how our most “personal” feelings and decisions with regard to our desires, bodies and relationships, are shaped by larger cultural, social, economic and political forces. Assessment: assignments and group project.
