Course Description
This course introduces students to the way economists think about current world problems such as generational inequality or the “other” side of Adam Smith. The course also introduces students to the topic of economic growth or how wealth is created and how it is influenced by technological change and institutions. It examines how this wealth is distributed most efficiently, including situations such as who gets the kidney from the donor or which firms get a license to offer mobile phone services. Finally, the course returns to inter-generational inequality including how economists think about tuition fees and university funding in general. The course concludes with a discussion on the usefulness and future of economics as an academic discipline.
