Course Description
This course discusses key theoretical approaches through which IR scholars analyze world politics, including realism, liberalism, Marxism, constructivism, and feminism. These theoretical approaches differ across several dimensions. Some focus on the role of states, while others place more emphasis on non-state actors. Some look at structural features of international relations to understand events and processes, while others prefer to look at the behavior of states to do so. Some argue that states' actions in the international system are driven by self-interest, while others maintain that norms and ideas shape behavior.
