Course Description
This course attends to three interconnected topics: the later medieval literature about and indebted to London and its institutions, the textual production of the city’s scriveners, and the notion of "London" that resulted from these two. Students read both literary and non-literary in Middle English or in translation from Latin. Students also become acquainted with recent theories of "place" and its role in literary production. Students study the most prominent Middle English poets, such as Langland, Chaucer, Gower, and Hoccleve, who worked in London.
