Course Description
The course provides an introductory overview of public health issues from both legal and policy perspectives. It investigates the power and motivation behind the governance of healthcare, notably through legislative action and judicial decisions. The course begins by exploring globally the main actors and most pressing concerns in public health. Students then transition to a focused case study each week on public health related issues in several jurisdictions including in the United States, the European Union and Latin America (as for instance access to reproductive rights/access to medications/healthcare policy reforms etc.). The final weeks look into forthcoming technologies in healthcare, examining the policy and legal challenges in managing the latest innovations in the field. The course provides students with starter tools in policy analysis and engagement with legal texts.
