Course Description
This course provides the jurisprudential framework of Chinese constitutional law and administrative law which establishes the primary legal foundation for Chinese government. The constitutional law, as the first part of this course, involves the following topics: general principle of Chinese constitutional law; the fundamental institution of the state and basic principles of economy and society; the system and structure of central and local government, which are based on the doctrines of democratic centralism and the unitary state; human rights, citizen's basic rights and obligations. The key theme of this part is relationship between the state and citizens in terms of constitutionalism. The administrative law is the larger part of this course. It studies a number of subjects on the executive body's establishments and functions. The topics are divided into four groups: general principle of Chinese administrative law; the organization of the executive body: formation and legal competence, the range of its functions, and the system of civil servant; the act of the executive body: form and process to make decision with legal effect, means to implement decision; supervision over the executive body and legal remedies to the aggrieved individuals, focusing on the administrative review, the judicial review and the state liability. The Chinese model of administrative law, namely the development-orientated administrative law is explored in-depth, based on the fact that the development dominates operation of Chinese government at all levels and on full scale.
