Course Description

Foreign policy is subject to external constraints (balance of power, strategic surprises, international norms) and internal constraints (balance between powers, political ideologies, influence of civil society). In spite of their power, the United States cannot be free from it and the decision-making process of their foreign policy can be understood only by taking these factors into account. This course provides students with the tools to understand this process and thus allows for a better understanding of the fabric of the foreign policy of the world's leading power.
