Course Description
This course provides a foundation for the use of quantitative and qualitative research methods to analyze political problems. It introduces students to using empirical evidence to resolve central research questions across the discipline, and to the methods used to gather, analyse, and interpret data used in politics research. The course takes a hands-on and applied approach: students learn to explore contemporary politics research questions using real data. Students develop the skills to become independent researchers and present the findings of their research in writing and visually in reports. Students assess critically data and analyses produced by others and/or presented in media debate. The course is relevant for students on many different degree programmes and students with diverse academic backgrounds.
