Course Description
Students explore the findings and theories of developmental sciences, an interdisciplinary field of research drawing from psychology, biology, sociology, anthropology, and related disciplines as applied to the study of human development across the lifespan. Students discuss a series of questions: Why, and how, do we develop; what pushes the development forward? How much knowledge about the world are we born with? What determines the course of our development and how do we end up being different from each other? Can we change the course of someone's development through changing their environment?
