Course Description

The course examines the question: can there be a universal ethics across cultural diversity? It studies contributions from anthropology, moral psychology, and the philosophy of evolution, alongside discussions on relativism, pluralism, and multiculturalism. This course explores how cultural identity shapes moral reasoning, and how the struggle for recognition has become central to contemporary political ethics. It investigates how cultural frameworks may hinder moral autonomy. It analyzes how ideologies, implicit biases, and microaggressions can reproduce structural inequalities and shape individuals' moral perceptions without their awareness.
