Course Description

This course covers French literature from the Middle Ages to the Renaissance. It is an analysis of the French literary canon and the historical, cultural, linguistic, political and social parameters that took place during the time of the authors. The course also considers why these works are consistently taught and reads authors often left out of the school system, such as female authors and francophone authors not from France. The course examines the parameters linked to the identity of an author, the object chosen, the language chosen, sex (cultural and political construction), race (literature said to be francophone, or national allophone literatures), social classes (the nobility of literary genres, literature said to be "popular"), and religion.
