Course Description
Non-state actors represent an oft-neglected category in international relations studies. After surveying the history of non-state actors, the course reviews, inter alia, international government organizations, political parties, global cities, non-governmental organizations, multinational firms, terrorist groups, media and moguls, actors from religion, culture, and sport. The course evaluates the interplay of these actors with states and with each other, then assesses the future impact of non-state actors. The course builds on a project initiated by Nicholas Dungan between Chatham House, the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London, and Egmont, the Belgian Royal Institute for International Relations in Brussels.
