Course Description
This course is a group research project focusing on a specific topic chosen from a list of approved topics selected by the participating faculty coordinators prior to the commencement of the program. Data collection and research activities are carried out as a group throughout the duration of the program, with the final research report completed independently. The research reports are submitted individually, with students presenting their research in their groups within a seminar structure. The project topic can come from any of the themes delivered throughout the program and will be developed based on factors such as faculty and local expertise, equipment availability, and ethical considerations. This project represents an outstanding opportunity for students to develop real-world research skills and practical solutions for challenging problems.
