Course Description
This course explores the political and economic conditions of society and the diverse ways that human groups organize their livelihoods, harness and distribute resources, and derive power and influence from doing so. The course explores the sub-field of political and economic anthropology and addresses how anthropologists continue to develop new directions in anthropology when addressing current events. Students become familiar with ethnographic work in political and economic anthropology and gain an understanding of concepts such as capitalism, industrialization, post-industrialization, socialism, post-socialism, commodity, gift, debt, market, money, production and consumption, distribution and exchange, the state, nationalism, colonialism, globalization, multiculturalism, and indigeneity.
