Course Description

This course helps students make sense of globalization by treating it as an historical phenomenon. They consider what has and what hasn't changed in how societies, economies, and politics are organized across the world. Students trace the emergence of technologies and practices which facilitate global interaction, from the container ship to the world wide web. They understand how globalization has been debated, examining the emergence of the idea of globalization, and the history of arguments about what it is and whether it is a good thing or not. Finally, students study its political consequences, charting debates about the effects of global interaction on the choices available to publics and their leaders, and asking how far institutions and individuals are able to shape phenomena which occurs on such a large scale.
