Course Description

This course examines psychological theory and its research applications to the real world. In particular, this course focuses on health psychology, forensic psychology, and organizational psychology. The health psychology component investigates why individuals engage in risky health behaviors, including smoking, overeating, and alcohol use; inequalities in health, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Island health; and dealing with chronic illness, including death, dying, and survivorship. The forensic psychology section explores lie detection, criminal offenders, victims of crime, and eyewitness memory. The organizational psychology component focuses on personnel selection, training in organizations, performance measurement, workplace motivation, and leadership.
