Course Description

This course focuses on four specific aspects of child language development in depth: the acquisition of syntax, the role of the environment and interaction in language development, language development and education, and atypical language development. It discusses and evaluates competing theories of language development and critically evaluate current research within the four areas outlined above. The course contains a practical component in which students use child language research tools to conduct their own research on corpus data. The analysis involves quantitative data and statistical analysis.
