Course Description

This is a course about moral and political philosophy as put forth by Burke and Kant, specifically on the rights, whether natural or not, of humans. It also looks at the way in which these two perspectives have been intended to constitute a widely distinct theory of the "real" rights of the man on philosophical, moral, political, and anthropological presuppositions. More broadly, this course is a reflection on the links between philosophy and politics that people attach to themselves. In discussion, the course looks at the critique of the "real" rights of man as put forth by several philosophers, including Jeremy Bentham and his critique on the existence of inherent rights.
