Course Description
This course is an introduction to literature and culture of the Romantic period in Britain from 1790 to 1830. Students explore a wide variety of literature from a period characterized by radical ideas and rebellion against tradition, and learn to draw connections between Romantic-era literary works and the culture and history of the period. Additionally, students analyze a variety of genres including novels, poetry, life writing, and political writing. The course highlights both central and more obscure texts from the Romantic period so that students can interpret these works in relation to their historical and cultural contexts. The course is a seminar that meets two hours per week for 10 weeks and for 20 hours total. This includes one two-hour group tutorial to develop your research methods and written term paper. Students are required to submit a term paper at an appointed time.
