Course Description
Faced by various challenges and opportunities, today's practitioners and students of international public policy need to find solutions to international governance from interdisciplinary and multidimensional perspectives. This course is an introduction to international public policy and provides a study of the actors, interactions among them, and crucial issue areas of international public policy. It brings together the academic study of international relations with analysis of public policy formulation and international governance beyond the nation-state. Topics include policy-making within the realm of political science, international relations, international public policy and comparative politics; as well as challenges of implementing complex international governance policies in different political, economic, technological, and cultural contexts. International public policy also covers various issue areas, such as conflict management, international law, immigration, education, public health, environmental protection, energy, terrorism, etc.
