Course Description
This course examines the socioeconomic, political, and cultural facets of urbanization with a regional focus on China, probably the best living laboratory to study urban development in today's world. The course introduces urban studies, and develops critical observation and analysis regarding the process of urbanization and its lived experiences in the Chinese context. Comparative lessons from other regions are drawn to encourage a comparative understanding of the complex processes of urbanization across the globe. Topics include urban issues ranging from land politics, urban planning, urban governance, citizen rights, urban space, and urban culture. Two sets of readings are introduced: classic writings in the field of urban anthropology/geography/sociology, and empirical studies specific on China.
