Course Description

This course explores Taiwan's relationship with the United States. It also examines the scope of the Department of the Communist Party of China since the normalization of relations with the United States in 1978 from the final stages of negotiations to the end Chen's presidency in 2008. The two countries have safely survived relations, including arms sales, strategic dialogue and military exchanges. Due to the United States' status as a global power, the "Taiwan Relations Act" (and its concerns with major issues of democracy, economic development, national defense, foreign relations, and developing relations with mainland China) is of great importance to continued relations. This course examines several major events over a 30-year period from the points of view of Taipei, Washington, and Beijing. During this period, the teachers have actually participated in various events, and can offer personal observation and reflections to students. Students select topics from the China, the United States and the Communist point of view to write a paper (less than 1,500 Chinese characters) on the day before class to upload to the CEIBA website for downloading the class to read.
